Abstract

Visual motion cues are used by tower controllers to support anticipated separation. Some of these cues are tabulated and an initial analyses of one them, landing deceleration, is provided as a basis for determining how controllers detect and use it. Understanding such cues will help determine how such cues may be degraded in a remote or virtual tower.